

Brooklyn Turns to Data to Help Solve Its Car-share, Parking Problem

News Staff | August 23, 2017

The New York City Department of Transportation (DOT) is riding on the wave of interest for car-sharing to reduce vehicle ownership in the city.

Through a two-year pilot program, the DOT hopes to reach its goal of ownership reduction with the overall goal of giving NYC drivers access to a rarity: more parking spaces.

According to BKLYNER, a local Brooklyn news source, the department will be designating around 300 on-street parking spaces and 300 other parking spots in multiple municipal parking facilities for participating car-share companies.

Companies like Enterprise, for example, allow consumers to rent cars for a short period of time.

<http://www.govtech.com/data/Brooklyn-Turns-To-Data-To-Help-Solve-Its-Car-share-Parking-Problem.html>